OPENING STATEMENT:

Description of some of George Merrick's work as Miami's Postmaster during the war years:

The day after Japan bombed Pearl Harbor, George came to work early because he knew that he would have added responsibility. A year earlier, following a government mandate that required men between 21 and 45 to register for the draft, he had set up the registration and recruitment offices on the second floor of the federal building in downtown Miami. When he arrived, he discovered more than 75 young men crowded into the hall in front of the Navy recruiting office waiting for it to open. The lines continued throughout the week and grew even longer after the United States declared war on Germany. Post offices also became the favorite place to buy defense bonds, later called war bonds. George had the responsibility of overseeing and promoting their sale. He also became one of the chairmen of the Defense Council of Dade County, organized to help sell bonds.
